The turn of the century saw the explosive birth of the cinema. This new medium's combination of accelerated technical and perpetual innovation has since replaced the traditional role of history painting, both formally—in terms of color saturation, scale, and quality of light—and as a visual document which recounts a story: fictional, historical or mythological.

Film stills engage the character of both mediums because they capture the fixed moment in which a painting tells a story, while also implying the many other moments through which a film does the same. By incorporating the static, non-narrative language of painting with the textual and inherently narrative implications of the motion picture, these film still paintings of credits, titles, and subtitles collapse the two mediums, forcing a variation of pictorial storytelling.
