U.S. Projects

Bruce Charlesworth
Lost Dance Steps
Installation -- Long Gallery

Bruce Charlesworth's installation, Lost Dance Steps serves as the context/location for a story in which Charlesworth appears on video tape as an escape artist in crisis. His role changes as he reconstructs for an absent visitor/narrator various fictionalized episodes. In addition to the video, the photographic serials that line the gallery provide a detailed account of character and plot. The rhythm between the still and moving images, as well as the theatrical setting presented in the video story, "draw in, control and release the viewer's attention". Although Lost Dance Steps is site specific, it expands upon themes Charlesworth has developed in previous installations.

Bruce Charlesworth lives in Minneapolis and has exhibited his work at the Walker Art Center, Minneapolis and "Film in the Cities", St. Paul, Minnesota. His photo-narratives are in the collection of the Walker Art Center, Minneapolis Institute of Art and the Polaroid Corporation. Lost Dance Steps is the first work of this type shown in New York City. Earlier photo-narrative installations shown in New York include Eddie Glove and Special Communiques, which were featured in the Persona show at the New Museum.

U.S. Projects

Tad Savinar
Rock
Installation -- Room 207

Tad Savinar's installation, Rock, which consists of a large painted sheetrock construction (8 x 12 x 8 feet) suggests the conventional shape of a diamond. His intention in the construction of Rock is to make an object whose physicality and meaning is familiar and easily recognizable as a symbol of wealth. In Rock, Savinar represents an art object and a diamond, both tangible commodities that he regards as having "value REGARDLESS of national or language barriers". By creating a monument of wealth and power, Savinar comments on the institutions, such as museums and world trade markets, whose control of the value of objects inevitably effect our personal value systems. In pointing out this process, Savinar acknowledges Rock as a "product of this financial fever".

Tad Savinar is an artist from Portland, Oregon. He is showing in New York City for the first time. He has had one-man exhibitions at the Portland Center for the Visual Arts, Portland Arts Museum and and/or in Seattle, Washington.
